A red tie cavalryman who rode with the Michigan Cavalry Brigade during the civil war

The civil war is in its second year, boys are dying by the thousands. Everybody thought it was going to be over by Christmas, Its been two years now. The south has been putting up one victory after another. There is no hope for the war to stop. The governor of Michigan, Austin Blair, keeps asking for men to answer to the call, to put down the rebellion that will restore our nation.

He wants to try something different, something that has never been tried before in the U. S. Army, a cavalry brigade made up from men from the state of Michigan, to fight side by side. Then just before the first battle, the brigade gets a new commander from Monroe Michigan, George Armstrong Custer. From Hanover to Appomattox, the Michigan cavalry brigade is there. This is a story of a boy made into a man from the hardships of the civil war. One of Custer's Red Tie boys. Thank God For Michigan!
